Satoru is a student at Mitsuba High School. He and his classmates will graduate from high school next month. He is planning to organize a graduation party with his classmates before they go off to different colleges or start working. He collected basic information about restaurants in the area, such as the types of food, prices, and the distance between the restaurant and the closest station to their school. Then, he made a survey. He asked each of his classmates to choose one restaurant and write down why they chose that restaurant.

The survey results were different from what he had expected. Satoru thought that Le Papillon would be the most popular choice since it is located very close to the station and his classmates can celebrate their graduation by eating at a fancy restaurant. However, more than half of them chose Toscana because they thought the price is not too expensive and it is not too far from the station. Chen's Kitchen is reasonably priced, but some students thought the restaurant was too casual. Hanami was the second most popular choice. Some students wrote that they really like the food there. Others wrote that they thought Japanese food would be suitable for graduation.

Once Satoru finished analyzing the results of his survey, he shared them with his classmates and told everyone that their graduation party would take place at Toscana. The students in his class were happy with the decision and told Satoru that they were looking forward to the graduation party. A group of students volunteered to help Satoru plan the party. They have only three weeks left until they graduate from high school. Satoru and his classmates hope that they can make as many good memories as possible during the rest of their time together.

Kumi is a sixteen-year-old high school student in Kyoto. Last year, she studied abroad in the US. This is her speech for English class about what she learned in the US.

Hi, everyone. Today, I'd like to talk about my American host mother, Jutta. I want to introduce her to you because I like her way of life very much. She is very good at finding small moments of happiness in her everyday life.

Jutta is 65 years old and lives alone in a small town in California. She started hosting exchange students a few years ago after she retired and she has welcomed many young foreign students. Last year, I stayed with her for one year.

Every day, she got up early and prepared a delicious breakfast for me. She loves gardening, so we usually had fresh fruits and vegetables from her garden. She always looked so happy when we ate together. Jutta often said, "I love breakfast. It's my favorite meal." On the weekends after breakfast, we often took a walk together through the town. There was a big park with a beautiful lake near her house. We would walk through the park and she would always tell me about the different plants and animals living there. She often said that the park was her favorite place. When we passed through the town, she would tell me about the history of the stores and buildings and always stopped to talk with the shopkeepers. She always laughed so much when she talked with them. She often said, "I love the people in this town. They're my favorite."

Before I started living with Jutta, I thought I needed to have something special or exciting in my life in order to be happy. But now, thanks to her, I realized that I don't need these things. What I need is to fully enjoy each moment and share my happiness with the people around me.

I learned a lot from living abroad for a year. I am now better at speaking English and have many new friends in the US. Above all, the most important thing was that I learned a new way to enjoy life from my friend, Jutta.
