Sonomi is a high school student at Midori High School. She is one of the members of the school festival committee. She and the other committee members would like to invite a famous person to the school festival this year to give a lecture to students and their parents. They decided to ask a professor who received the Nobel Prize in Chemistry several years ago. They thought all the students would be interested in his talk because many students at Midori High School like science-related subjects such as chemistry, biology, physics, and mathematics. They decided to ask the professor to talk about his research and experience as a researcher.

Sonomi and the other members of the school festival committee discussed where to hold the lecture. Some members suggested using the school gym because it is free. However, other members disagreed with the idea. They thought that the lecture should be held in a place with nice seats and a better sound system so that students can relax and enjoy the lecture. Fortunately, Midori Town Community Center is located near Sonomi's school and it has a beautiful, new lecture hall. After much discussion, the committee members chose to have the lecture there.

Their school festival will be held for three days from Thursday to Saturday on the third week of November this year. In the beginning, the committee members wanted to have the lecture on the first day of the school festival. However, since it is on a Thursday, this makes it difficult for many parents to come and enjoy the lecture. Therefore, they agreed to have it on the last day. They called the community center and booked the lecture hall for three hours in the afternoon. All the students, teachers, and parents are looking forward to the lecture.

Rei is a university student from a small town in the countryside. Last year, he moved to Tokyo to study business at university, but he often misses his hometown. His goal is to become a successful businessperson and help bring life back to small countryside towns.

At university, Rei often talks about his goal with Professor Yamada, his advisor. She encouraged Rei to apply to a business plan competition held by a small city. The city is collecting business ideas for how they can reuse a large 150-year-old traditional Japanese home. Rei decided to enter the competition and asked three of his classmates, who also major in business, to join him.

Their first meeting, however, did not go well. Everyone had their own ideas, and they could not agree on a single one because they did not want to reject the ideas of the other person. After two weeks, they still could not decide on a business plan. Discouraged, Rei went to Professor Yamada for advice. She listened to his story and said, "I think your group's problem is that you are scared to disagree with each other's ideas because you think disagreeing with an idea is the same as disagreeing with the person. It's not."

Rei understood Professor Yamada's advice. The next day, he talked with his group members and asked everyone to share their ideas again. "This time," Rei said, "let's honestly share our opinions. Even if we disagree with someone's idea, it's okay. Not liking someone's idea does not mean that you do not like the person. We are just disagreeing with the idea, not the person."

After listening to Rei, his teammates felt more comfortable expressing their opinions to one another. Five hours later, they finally decided on the first draft of their business plan that included all of their group's best ideas.

For three months, the four of them worked hard every day on their business plan. They passed the first stage of the contest. Three months later, they presented their business plan online, in front of the judges and other participants. Although their team did not win, Rei got something much more valuable. He learned that it is okay to disagree with others' ideas as long as you treat them respectfully. He also got some great ideas to help revive his hometown.
